the famous 1960's film To Live in Two Cities, our town is famous in a sort of different way. Colonized by Dutch seafarers long ago, Ekibin was in fact the only settlement on the north-east shore for 30 years back in the 18th century. It managed to survive the 1970's flood which extensively damaged our famous neighbouring town. Ekibin, due to it’s high ground, didn’t suffer from rising river levels at all. It appears because of our neighbouring town’s low lying agricultural area, it received a lot of damage. So, Ekibin goes way back in history and it’s possible to still see architecture resembling that of old Holland along the riverbanks.

Now, moving on to future developments, Ekibin will no doubt undergo changes over the next few decades due to it’s rising population and increasing urban sprawl. Just like our neighbouring town, the local government has provided funding for a number of initiatives such as three new public schools on the south side. Although Fairfield has introduced the new “Goodwill Bridge” linking up the towns in more convenience, the mayor of Ekibin has chosen to extend the motorway to a new section down the east coast along the beach, which will make access easier. Currently, there’s no future proposal for new communal housing estates throughout Ekibin at this stage... (fade out)
